NEWS OF THE

Kathy Kelley of CTF uses a card from the Talking About Touching curriculum to teach a personal safety lesson to second graders at St. Edward's School in Brockton.

CTF breaking the cycle of child sexual abuse

The statistics on sexual abuse of children can seem overwhelming. Studies show that one out of three girls and one out of five boys are sexually victimized before the age of 18. A pedophile abuses an average of 244 victims over his or her lifetime, according to the National Institute of Mental Health.

The recent child sexual abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Boston demonstrates that abuse often occurs where least expected, committed by adults who hold the respect and fondness of families. In fact, in contrast with "stranger danger" stereotypes, studies show that most perpetrators of child sexual abuse are adults who are family members or otherwise known to the child.

When the Archdiocese of Boston needed help in responding to the sexual abuse crisis, it called upon the expertise of the Massachusetts Children's Trust Fund, including the appointment of CTF Executive Director Suzin Bartley to the Cardinal's Commission for the Protection of Children.

As the only statewide, non-profit organization dedicated solely to the prevention of child abuse and neglect, CTF is uniquely experienced in helping children and adults cope with what is often a difficult topic to address.

"CTF's work with the Commission was important, but we need to recognize that child sexual abuse is not only a problem within the Catholic Church," Bartley said. "It occurs in epidemic numbers throughout society."

Learning to talk about abuse

Since 1990, CTF has provided school-based training curricula in child personal safety to child-care centers, schools, and school districts throughout Massachusetts.

One of those curricula, "Talking About Touching" creates a comfortable environment for discussing the topic of personal safety by including it with general safety information about fire, bicycle, and traffic lessons.

The researched-based and age-appropriate curriculum discusses touching in terms of safety. It is not sex education, but simply teaches children the rule for touching: "No one should touch your private body parts, those areas covered by a bathing suit, unless it is to keep you clean and healthy."

"Talking about Touching is one of the oldest and most professionally developed abuse prevention education programs," said David Finkelhor of University of New Hampshire, a nationally recognized expert in sexual exploitation of children.

"It also has been widely used, and evaluated more than any other program," Finkelhor said.

"Talking about Touching is educational material that provides the necessary clarity, accuracy, and simplicity needed for good training in Catholic schools," said Cardinal Commission member Mary Jane England, M.D., president of Regis College and former commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Social Services.

"It can help educate current and next generations to have zero tolerance for abuse," England said.

Getting parents involved

Working with the developer of the program, Committee for Children, CTF trained Archdiocese staff and volunteers to implement the curriculum in Pre-K, Kindergarten, grades 1 to 4, and religious education classes.

The schools held informational meetings to engage and educate parents, who play a critical role in the success of the program. Parents also receive updates on classroom activities and are asked to reinforce safety lessons at home.

"The curriculum provides the opportunity for parents to acquire the skills and language to better protect their children. For example, parents learn to establish the critical safety rule: 'We don't keep touching secrets in this family,'" Bartley said.

It is estimated that tens of thousands of children, staff, volunteers, and parents will receive the training through the Archdiocese implementation.

"On behalf of the children of the Archdiocese, I'd like to thank the Committee for Children and the Children's Trust Fund for their hard work in helping to implement this important safety program," said Deacon Anthony Rizzuto, director of the Office of Child Advocacy, Implementation, and Oversight for the Archdiocese.

"With your help, we can ensure we are doing everything possible to protect our children and create a safer environment where the scandal of child abuse can be prevented," Rizzuto said.

Why I support Children's Trust Fund

"Even though I live in a relatively affluent community, I understand that teen pregnancy, child abuse, poor parenting, etc. can occur across income levels," wrote Julia Hanna, of Milton, in her donation letter to CTF.

Julia, 13, heard that CTF faced state budget cuts. She decided to act and selected CTF as the beneficiary of her Tzedakah, the act of kindness required as part of her Bat Mitzvah.

"Your program provides such crucial assistance that it would be horrible if the budget cuts succeeded in eliminating or diminishing any of its programming," wrote Julia, who entered the eighth grade in fall.

She donated $500. "I wish I could make a larger donation, because your program deserves our full support."

Julia is busy with her temple, Girl Scouts, dance and piano lessons. But she would like to continue to help CTF.

She and her mom, Karen, who is also her Girl Scout leader, plan to recruit her troop to organize an in-kind gift drive to benefit participants in Healthy Families Massachusetts.

"I'd love to help this program because I know that CTF does important work to help families," Julia said.

Help to prevent child abuse during the holiday season

Year-end giving is a wonderful way to prevent child abuse and neglect in your community, as well as save on taxes.

There is no easier way to help children in Massachusetts and earn a charitable deduction than by writing a check. Your envelope must be postmarked by Dec. 31 to receive a deduction for 2003 tax year.

For example: if you make a charitable gift of $10,000 in 2003, you can save $3,300 in taxes if you are in the 33% tax bracket. The higher your tax bracket, the more money you save with a charitable gift.

Year-end 2003 is also a great time to consider a gift of stock.

Giving appreciated stock allows you to save taxes two ways. You avoid paying capital gains tax on the increase in value of your stock. You also receive a tax deduction for the full fair-market value of the stock.

You also can make a donation on a monthly basis. This can be done automatically on your credit card or through monthly checks.

For example, if you pledge a gift of $1,000, your payments will be $84 per month.

For information about year-end giving, please call Jodi A. Wolin, chief development officer, at 617-727-8957, ext. 339.

Please check with your financial advisor regarding personal tax implications.
